This invention relates to a metal alloy steel pipe and more particularly to an improved chrome alloy steel which exhibits high strength, improved creep properties and high ductility and is suitable for use in high pressure applications. In the past, the high-strength alloy steels which have been used for the manufacture of industrial and marine structural components, piping, tubing, exchangers, etc., were predominantly alloy steels of type 304 and 304L. The availability of such high strength alloys and the absence of better corrosion resistance than that provided by type 304 and 304L at a relatively low cost have made them the standard materials for the manufacture of pipes and similar components in the chemical processing industry. However, as the service conditions and required corrosion resistance have become more severe and expensive, this material has no longer been available. For example, corrosion resistance in the oil and petrochemical industry requires materials that exhibit reasonable corrosion resistance at service temperature in the presence of carbon dioxide, crude oil and other corrosive media. In addition, there is an increasing concern about damage to the environment as a result of corrosion. However, corrosion of these materials which has been permitted because of their lower cost has been continuing to accelerate. The application of corrosion protection by electrodeposition increases the material costs substantially, and there is a growing need for high strength materials that exhibit improved corrosion resistance. In addition, it is extremely important to limit the effects of corrosion on the material's high strength properties. The use of chrome alloy steels to increase the strength of the steel is well known and in some instances the addition of more than 1.0 wt. % of chromium increases the tensile strength and ultimate tensile strength. However, in
