the fact that, as in the case of the unique example, no charge was made for the services of a draftsman, the device, although certainly allowable and for a purpose proper, was not indispensable, and was therefore merely incidental to the main purpose of the corporation, and, being an integral part of the transaction, was properly deducted under the statute. (Citing cases.) The court said, after describing the statutory deduction as a proper one, 'The question here is not whether, if the corporation had been called an express company, it would have been compelled to make the deduction, but whether, if it had been required to make such a deduction in order to deduct from its gross receipts the amount of the charge, the company was entitled to retain the amount as a separate item of income. We think that it was. The charge was not made for the services of the draftsman, nor did it constitute a business expense of the corporation; it was a personal charge. * * * But even if the charge was a business expense, it was merely incident to a business transaction, for the draftsman was employed to make a study for the company which is here the corporation.' (Page 599.) In St. Louis Smelting & Refining Co. v. United States, 158 F. 546, 549 (C.C.A.8), the court had before it an oil company's tax return for 1918. It reported the cost of doing business to be $111,000 and issued 10,000 shares of its own stock for that amount. The company paid to a professional accountant, as part of his services, $16,400 for preparing its tax return. The tax court held that this sum was not deductible from the gross income of the company. The court said: 'In the absence of any law or regulation to the contrary, we do not think there can be any doubt that, if the return for the year in suit had been prepared by the respondent [the taxpayer] itself, by private accountants, or by any other method, the entire amount paid to such accountants would have been properly a deduction from the income of the respondent. But the important thing is that in case of returns for the year 1918, such as this one was, it is specifically provided by the statute that the net income shall be computed upon a basis designated by the Revenue Act of 1918, and that the deductions from such income shall be such as are allowed by the act to be deductions. The statute specifically provides that
