1-1-1 Free Download Microleakage of different fissure sealant materials tested in a single set of bovine teeth: an in vitro study. To compare the microleakage of two new adhesive sealant materials and an existing fissure sealant material, when employed in a single set of bovine teeth. Four fissure sealant materials (Kendment Fissureseal, Oxyguard, Clinpro and Helioclear F), a resin-based sealant (Clearfil SE Bond) and an amalgam restorative material (Dispersalloy) were applied to 50 buccal and lingual surfaces of 20 bovine teeth with occlusal surface wear. The teeth were stored in water at 37 degrees C for 7 days then thermocycled for 5000 cycles in water (5 degrees C to 55 degrees C) and stained with 0.5% basic fuchsin. All samples were examined under a stereomicroscope at magnification x20. The stained, prepared samples were then sectioned through the buccal fissure and scored using modified Quirynen's criteria. The fissure sealant materials were ranked according to occlusal microleakage as follows: No leakage: Fissureseal, Oxyguard, Clinpro and Helioclear F; Low leakage: Clearfil SE Bond; High leakage: Dispersalloy. A significant difference was found between Clearfil SE Bond and the fissure sealants. With one exception, all the fissure sealants performed better than the resin-based sealant. In this study, the fissure sealants, in general, performed better than the resin-based sealant. The fissure sealants demonstrated good occlusal microleakage, which may affect retention and marginal adaptation. Sealants were not designed for occlusal surfaces. They cannot be relied upon to cleanse or debride, but they do protect fissures and if they are simple, they may be advantageous in preventing penetration of bacteria and allergens from saliva, diet or tobacco, into the tooth. Sealant application is the simplest and most cost-effective approach to preventing caries, even on occlusal surfaces. The types of fissure sealants described here should be the first choice for occlusal surface sealant application.***** * Copyright (c) 2000, 2008 IBM Corporation and others.
