Available for PC, Mac & Linux platforms.It started with a guy named Norman Joly. Joly, who lived in London, had a certain romantic streak. He often experimented with drugs and travelled to Spain with some friends. In September 1965, he started to send a few short text messages from a pay phone. His first one was: "I came!". Twelve months later, the person answering these messages was The Beatles. In November 1966, McCartney taped a phone message for him, asking if he could call him anytime. Joly called the number, and was connected to a cello player in the group's newly formed office. "I was just so excited," he told Wired in October. "I was thinking, 'This is the Beatles! I'm talking to the Beatles!'" The correspondence continued throughout the months that followed. In May 1967, Joly received a telegram from Ringo saying, "Turn your phone on. Ringo." They shared their thoughts, traded photos and did the things that friends do. At first, Joly wrote the band almost every day. Then, he contacted them less frequently. He stopped doing so after he started college in 1968. Joly was in the French Foreign Legion at the time. "It didn't take me long to realise that I needed to get back to England," he told Wired in October. He wrote again to the four lads a few months later, and their response was quick. "I received a telegram from him right away, saying it was all right to call him," he explained.This view from NASA's Solar Terrestrial Relations Observatory shows the sunspot at the heart of a fast-moving cloud on May 19, 2014. The sun produced a massive solar storm on Tuesday that has triggered a hurricane-like weather phenomenon in the Earth's upper atmosphere, according to new observations from NASA's Solar Terrestrial Relations Observatory (STEREO).
